Creating a Win-Win Partnership Between Inside and Outside Counsel

Whether in-house counsel is new to the job or just new to the company, outside counsel can often assist that transition based on his or her own institutional knowledge of the client. By providing useful information about the company's products or business, litigation history, governing regulations, or internal resources, mentoring newer in-house counsel strengthens personal and client relationships. This program will present practical information and tips that outside counsel can provide to new in-house counsel, including a workshop to suggest best practices for real-world scenarios.

In sum, if you have the proper mindset, obstacles can be opportunities to thrive in your profession.
